Personal Statement

There is a 13-year gap in my teaching experience during which time I worked for a public consulting firm and raised three children. This time away from education rekindled my original passions for teaching. And as a result of my real-world experiences, I understand more than ever the criticality of teaching my students how to read analytically, write effectively, and speak with authority and confidence. Students in my classroom hone these skills not only through study of classical literature, but also a variety of cross-curricular expository texts.
